The Letter of Appreciation

Dear Dr. Schustereder,

Warm greetings!

I write this letter to extend my hearty congratulations on your latest progress. It is no surprise that your talent, versatility and compassion lead you to today's attainment.

The general internal medicine that you dedicated yourself to is among the most challenging and intensive occupations. Despite lengthy training and research cycles, you equipped yourself with well-rounded knowledge in both clinical surgery and emergency medicine through years of first-hand practice. I can recall vividly your deep insights on humanity-centered medicine and your rigorous attitude towards findings that ensure a leading position

Dear Dr. Schustereder,

Warm greetings!

I write this letter to extend my hearty congratulations on your latest progress. It is no surprise that your talent, versatility and compassion lead you to today's attainment.

The general internal medicine that you dedicated yourself to is among the most challenging and intensive occupations. Despite lengthy training and research cycles, you equipped yourself with well-rounded knowledge in both clinical surgery and emergency medicine through years of first-hand practice. I can recall vividly your deep insights on humanity-centered medicine and your rigorous attitude towards findings that ensure a leading position in relevant research fields. You establish yourself as a great researcher with dedication and commitment.

Your passion for the wellness of people is just as impressive as your tireless efforts. I was deeply moved when you share your residency in Central African Republic, where for the first time in life, you cure, teach, regulate and yell for the impoverished and reflect on the real needs of the people. As the old Chinese saying goes, "It is better to travel ten thousand miles than to read ten thousand books." Even at first sight can I tell your compassion and enthusiasm for public health – they serve as the strong and irreplaceable incentives for a professional career so demanding as internal medicine.

You further leverage your contribution to the medical world by claiming the responsibility to teach at universities and medical centers. In a people science like primary care, it is critical to preserve the curiosity for knowledge and the ability to learn from others' experience. Thanks to your outstanding communication skills, you supplement involute texts with lively cases and cheerful explications so that people apprehend medical principles with great interest. The audience always enjoy listening to your speeches – your humor and versatility is a source of joy to many of us.

Indeed, you are a high-performing scholar, committed scientist and practical philanthropist. You have made note-worthy contributions to the science and medical world, and I have confidence that granted time, you will fulfill your ambition to discover humanness and bring even more accomplishments and kindness to the international community.

Congratulations again! I wish you all the best in life and career.

Kind Regards,

LI Baodong
